Early Mums - Early Sales

Leon Mack (above), former mechanical engineer with Edison Electronics, is now a full-fledged flower grower and horticulturist with these early blooming chrysanthemums and asters to prove the point in a beautiful way. The mums plus pinks, fibrous begonias, gloxinia and 400 poinsettias busy growing for Christmas trade, are all a part of Mack's Greenhouseson Road 649, southwest Appomattox County. The greenhouse, itself, was designed by National Greenhouse Co. with plastic (hail-proof and wind-resistant) walls neclosing heating and cooling equipment, ten long planting benches and automatic watering system which extends to the outdoor growing area. The mums are named Golden Tranquility, Ruby Mound and Orange Bronze and for gardeners there are browallia plants, "Dusty Miller' and more.

Engineer Mack has put his skill and know-how into a new enterprise and with Appomattox county's especially nice growing season this summer it's no surprise that his flowers are especially large and pretty!

Conservation Now For The 21st Century

by R. E. McClenny, Jr.
Soil Conservationist
Appomattox-Campbell Counties

A recent Conservation Needs Survey conducted by the Soil Conservation Service, with assistance of other agriculture agencies shows that the quality of our own timberlands continues to worsen. Over 74,000 acres of woodland in Appomattox County need improvement or reforestation. This inventory also revealed that 14,500 acres of pasture needs improvement or reseeding, while 11,400 acres of cropland still needs strip cropping or mulch planting.

Our forest acreage is by far the largest with 72% of the county or 160,000 acres in woodland. About 10,000 acres in the state forest and more than 36,000 acres owned by the forest industry are mostly well managed. The portion owned by farmers and others is mostly poorly managed.

A woodland resource study of Appomattox County revealed that about 25% of the land is capable of growing excellent hardwood or pine. The problem is that most of the hardwood has been cut on a "cut-the-best-leave-the-worst" basis until the existing stand is mostly cull trees. Except where a good stand of hardwood exists, the land would yield greater income in pine.

Another 58% of the county is capable of yielding good pine. Much of this land is in cut-over hardwood. These soils will produce several times more returns in pine than hardwood.

"Pine-clay" soils and steep shaly soils are not capable of producing good quality timber. Actually, the plastic soils are better suited to grassland, while the shady soils are usually on steep slopes and shuld be in woodland.

The industry of agriculture has the ability to adjust quickly to supply and demand changes. A good example of this has been the swine industry. Favorable hog prices created a lot of interest and farmers greatly increased production. When prices fell, so did the number of hog farmers. While farmers can adjust quickly to shortages in crops and livestock, they will be at least 20 years behind in trying to meet the predicted shortages of wood products. Timber to be cut 20 years from now is already growing.

To promote reforestation in Virginia, the general assembly has passed the Reforestation Timberlands Act which will help share the cost of preparing land and planting pine. Funds are also available throug the Rural Enviornment Assistance Program. Along with financial assistance, technical assistance is available from the Va. Division of Forestry which administers the two reforestation programs.

The Soil Conservation Service can provide landowners with soils information and help land owners determine the capability of their land for producing the various species of trees.

Time waits for no one and the 21st century will arrive whether we are ready or not. We must begin managing our woodland now for the 21st century.
